

Hair Transplant Surgery

Hair transplant surgery is a procedure performed under local anaesthetic with minor sedation, where small, naturally-occurring groups of hairs (follicular units grafts), are taken from the back of the scalp (the area where the hairs have naturally lower levels of DHT) and replanting the graft in the areas of thinning or balding.

Grafts either have one, two or three hairs in them, in their natural groupings. The degree of balding or thinning of a person's hair determines how many grafts will be needed. As the hairs are taken in their natural groupings the result of a hair transplant is undetectable and looks completely natural.

How does it work?

Hair transplant surgery only works by using a person's own hair therefore making it impossible for it to be rejected. The best way to understand the concept of a hair transplant is to think of your scalp as a garden, taking the plants from the back garden and replanting them into the front garden, where they grow the same way they would have previously. The replanted hair is 'permanent hair' and can be treated exactly the same way as the rest of your hair. The hair can be straightened, dyed, curled and styled. Hair transplant surgery is suitable for treating male hair loss and female hair loss.

Transplants for scars or burns?

FUT or FUE can be used to successfully cover or camouflage any type of scars or burns on the scalp or face. FUT or FUE is often used to cover scars around the hairline from previous surgery, beard or eyebrow scars or any type of burns or other scarring in both men and women.
